The cluiter, however, is only one, although the most opvious, of the campaigning evils. The underlying threat is in the existing cost of campaigns and their threat to competition.

There is as election rule which sets any limit on assety to be spent for campaigning, nor any rule which states from what source the campaigning, nor any rule which states from what source the campaigning, nor any rule which states from what source the campaigning, nor any rule which states from what source the campaigning, however, that a candidate should use only his own money for campaigning. His friends are expected to donate physical, mental and moral support only.

That nebulous understanding has the elasticity of a well-chewed piece of bubble gum. It has stretched now to the point where candidates without backing of some organized group, such as a fraternity or sorurity, can't put up a good show, competitively.

Spending up to $200 for a campaign is high financing

Spending up to $200 for a campaign is high financing for an average class office-seeker. College elections are not meant to be, nor should they be, products of a 'machine," with a "party fund," but they are.

Some of the campus' best students are h ships, or working their own way through. The high cost of campaigning is a direct discouragement to these people.

Election rules calling for fewer posters are needed. The day of the "big wind" plainly indicated that the worst can happen if nature backs the present trend. The campus looked like a bargain basement after a Saturday rummage Congressmen should first establish other standards, safeguarding the student's right to choose his officers and representatives, with regard to amount of ability, rather than the amount of cash.

Plans like the Know Your Candidate program carried out in the women's dorms and the Frosh-Soph Campaign Coffee Hour should be encouraged. Others of this type hould be suggested.

Limits can be set on campaign expenses. Ingenuity should be given a chance to work in place of currency.

New congressmen have the chance to clear away the clutter of old election rules now, before next term's freshman elections make the campus look like another high school picnic grove

They can make elections, starting next fall, more demoeratic, less expensive and infinitely more easy to clean up after.
