A China Memoir

In the Spring of 1973, Shirley MacLaine was invited to bring a delegation of American women to the People's Republic of China. "The Other Half of the Sky" reflects this experience.

The title derives from a saying by Chairman Mao: "Women must have equality so they can learn to hold up their half of the sky." The new role given Chinese women by the Revolution stands at the center of this documentary, by, for and about women. It offers a delightful, awakening 75 minutes.

MacLaine was asked not to bring a delegation of famous American women, but a group representing a range of socioeconomic backgrounds. The women include: Pat Branson, of Port Arthur Texas, a strong supporter of Governor Wallace; Unita Blackwell Wright, a Black Mississippi political activist; Phyllis Kronhausen, a clinical psychologist; Rosa Marin, sociologist and former director of Puerto Rico's School of Social Work Research; Margaret Whitman, a conservative Republican from Boston; and Karen Boutilier, a teenager from California.

Together, these women discover each other and the alien culture in which they find themselves. The emphasis is not on military might, food or industrial growth but the daily lives of the Chinese people, especially the women. During the tour the women traveled to Peking where they attended May Day celebrations and met with Madame Chou En Lai. They also visited Shanghai, Canton, the Great Wall and other standard tourist attractions. They saw a neighborhood council, a pottery factory, day care centers, grammar schools, and a Caesarian delivery by acupuncture.

The Caesarian footage, in living color is only for those who can take their operations straight. MacLaine produced, wrote and co-directed this film. She molded her material into a look at the unexpected, ordinary aspects of Chinese culture. She and filmmaker Claudia Weill directed with care and precision. The film has a joyous, unrehearsed quality achieved by Weill's exquisite photography, and edited into a cohesive, comprehensible experience by Weill and Aviva Slesin.

The opening sequences have a fuzzy photographic quality which goes away after the first half hour and then improves dramatically. The editing and unity of the Great Wall sequence, the Caesarian and the neighborhood council make them moving impressions on both viewer and tourist. The climax touches the viewer as it did these women who went into an alien land and found friends.

The China Memoir which follows is one of those talking head sequences PBS revels in. It is not worth wasting time on.

See "The Other Half of the Sky," it is a beautiful film.
