Then seizing his violin, he hurs it tightly between his chin and chest, and stands for a few more seconds gazing at it in motionless abstraction. The audience is now completely, hushed, and all eyes are riveted upon one silent and almost grotespae form. Suddenly Paganini relieshis bow and dashes it down like a sledge-hammer upon the strings. The opening of the concerto abounds in solo passages, in which he has to be left almost without accompaniment; the orchestra is reserved for the luttle and slight interludes. Paganini now revels in his distinctive and astonishing passages, which hold the audience breathless. At one time torrents of chords peal forth, as from, some mimic orchestra; harmonic passages are thrown off with the sharpness and sourity of the flute accompanied by the guitar, independent phrases being managed by the left hand plucking the strings, while the right is playing legato passages with the bow. The most difficult intervals are spanned with ease—the immense, compass-like fingers glide up and down every part of the keyboard, and seem to be in ever so many places at once. Heavy chords are struck indifferently with the point or keel of the bow, as if each inch of the large wand were equally under control; but just when these productions feats of skill are causing the senses to reel with something like a painful strain, a low measured melody steals forth and penetrates, the souls of all present, until some of the andience break out into uncontrollable applause, while others are melted to tears, overpowered by the thrilling accents.
