"It was in the month of March, in the year 1855, a cold night, when we had a bright coal fire in an open grate in the parlor. Unexpectedly Mr. Home, who not as famous then as he has sine become, came in, and, at my request, be assented to a sitting. We sat at a little carditable, only about eight teet from the blazing grate of coals, which made the room light after all other artificial light had been shut off. Nobody was present but myself, my wife, and Home, a lady visitor who was in the house having re-tired to bed in a distant room up stairs He sat opposite to me, a small card table between us, and my wife at the further end. Home soon began to go off into a trance, and, as an experiment, I laid upon the floor a quire of foolscap, and put a lead-pencil on it. The qu paper was first gently lifted without any apparent agency, and placed upon the table near my hand. The light from the table near my hand. The light from the grate seven or eight feet from the table enabled me to see everything that was going on. Home was motionless as a log, leaning back in his chair.

"Following the quire of paper came the pencil. It was flipped up from the floor without any visible person touching the many of the pencil.

, and fell upon the paper. Then it owly lifted itself, the point resting on the paper. I placed my face within a foot of it, but could see no hand, though the light was sufficient, if the hand had been flesh and blood, to have shown it at a distance of many feet. The pencil began to write slowly, Home being still perfectly motionless on the other side of the table: Having finished its writing, the pencil dropped. Narrowly watching Home, I dropped. Narrowly watching frome, looked at him from his head to his fee and cast my eyes along his legs, which were under the the table. From near his feet at that instant there came up a human hand. It moved some distance, and reached out to me from a point too far away from Home for him to have reached it without sitting up and bending forward, which he did not do, for he con-tinued leaning back as inert as a dead man. The hand grasped mine and shook it as cordially as if it had been moved by an old friend. Then it sought to withdraw. I held it firmly, but it pulled with a force like that which a person would use who wanted to draw his hand away. I was thoroughly aroused now and resolved that whatever else occurred that hand should not get away from me. I held it with a grip of iron. Plading it impossible to get away, it then yielded itself to my inspection. I could see it was a woman's hand, almost preternaturally long, peculiar in shape, but symetrical and perfect, and as white as if it had been made of plaster or flour. I could see that it ended at the wrist; but wishing to substantiate this astounding fact by other proof than that of the eves, I passed my left hand up and down where the arm should be, and there was nothing there. "Then I examined the hand. It would open and shut as it lay in my hand, to show me, as I suppose, that it was governed by an intelligent guiding power; and it even turned over, as if to afford me every facility for making an examination. It had perfect finger-nails, perfect articulations, even the wrinkles on the articulations, even the wrinkles on the middle joints, like any other hand, but all was dead white. Its feeling was neither cold nor warm, but soft, like that of a lady's hand enveloped in a kid glove. Taking hold of it with my left hand, and a lady's hand enveloped in a kird giove.

Taking hold of it with my left hand, and holding it firmly, I gradually wormed holding it firmly, I gradually wormed and some interesting statistics. A Struggle for Life. The other day a young man named Benjamin Machamer, one of the best hunters in Northumberland county, Pa, made a remarkable escape from a well-into which he fell. This well is in the lower part of the town of Trevorton, half acres, four and one-half tons of near the old round house. So long a grapes; from two acres, 800 bushels of time has elapsed since it has been in use grapes. that its existence was almost forgotten. It is about eight feet wide and eighteen feet deep, and at the present time contains about ten feet of water. It was covered with a plank the day in question.

Machamer started out in persuit of game, accompanied by his dog, a valuable setaccompanied by his Gog, a valuable set-ter. His path lay near the old well, into which the dog had the misfortune to fall, through a hole caused by the de-caying plants. The dog was highly prized by Mr. Machamer, who, in at-tempting to rescue it, fell in himself. In an ordinary sized well the situation would have been danaerous, and in this case it was extremely so, as the unusual width of the well prevented him from bracing himself against the side. The oracing numser against the side. The only possible way for him to get out was to climb up one side, and, as the well was very closely built, this was a difficult feat. But it was a struggle for life and Mr. Machamer being a young gang consists of torty-five men, and the man of powerful strength and great en-ergy resolved to try. He succeeded in men each, alternating night and day. almost reaching the top, only to loose his hold and fall back. Again and again he climbed up the wall, and each time fell back into the cold water neath. Every time he fell back the halfstrangled dog would spring upon his shoulders thus bearing him down and keeping him under water. In spite of this difficulty, however, he would sue ceed in regaining the wall. At one time he became faint from the effect of the impure air. He had found a small stick floating on the water, which he inserted in the wall and placed one foot upon it, then put both hands in another aperture thinking if he did swoon he might pos sibly hang there until he returned to consciousness. The faintness, however, passed away, and he again attempted to reach the top. Finding that his wet clothes greatly impeded his progress, he succeeded in divesting himself of his coat and boots one of which he threw out, leaving the other with the coat to sink to the bottom. Thirteen climbed up to the side of the well, and thirteen times he fell back into the well. His perseverance surpassed that of the traditional spider, for he had great odds to contend with. At last, almost worn out, he made a final effort, and reached the top. He didn't wait for the dog, but started for home immediately, and told his story. His father and another genman returned at once and rescued the
