FOREST TREE SEEDS.—The numerous inquiries, says the American Agriculturist, as to the treatment of seeds show that much interest is felt in the raising of We repeat the suggestions forest trees. made once before, that unless one is intending to plant largely, or has abundant time to devote to his seed beds, it will generally be cheaper to purchase seedling trees than to raise them. There are several nurseries which make a specialty of seedlings of forest trees, and offer them at exceedingly low prices. We here condense a few points for those who wish to grow trees from the seed. Of the trees generally planted a few ripen their seed in the late spring or early summer. The seed, if kept until the following spring, will be worthless, hence it must be sown immediately after it is gathered. The red maple (Acer rubrum,) the silver or white maple (A. dany-carpum,) and the elm (Ulnus Americana) have this peculiarity, and whoever would raise these must make arrangements to procure the seeds as soon as ripe, and sow them as soon as received. If the seeds are good they germinate promptly, and make nice little trees by autumn. There are many tree seeds that may be sown in the fall but there is so much risk of loss by mice and from other causes that it is generally preferred to keep them until spring. ries, the black walnut and the butternut are best kept in heaps made upon the ground and covered first with sods, and then a few inches of earth, or in the absence of sods a layer of bog-hay or straw may be placed over the nuts, and the earth heaped over that. Nearly all other seeds, including thin-shelled nuts, like chestnuts and acorns, are best pre-The sand should

The obthe resolution providing for the adjourn- ject is to prevent the nuts from drying, ment of the two Houses from Fridsy next and to so separate them that there will be no danger of heating; if the sand is too moist the seeds will rot. The seeds should usually be mixed with twice their bulk of sand, and be well distributed throughout it. For small quantities of seeds in sand we have found flower-pots with the holes plugged up very convenient. The seeds of many trees will germinate freely if kept dry like garden seeds, until spring, but the use of sand is safer. They should be kept in a cool place through the winter, and with some very hard-shelled seeds i is well to let them freeze and thaw a few times. The seeds of evergreens are best kept if allowed to remain in their cones, though if fresh they generally keep well when removed. Much of the failure with these is due to sowing too late. Cuttings of willows, cottonwoods, and other trees raised in this manner, should be a foot or so long, and about half an inch in diameter. These are best cut in the fall or early winter, tied securely in bundles, and stored in sand in the cellar.

The yard is made of inch spruce fencing strips, four inches wide, ten or twelve feet long, nailed to three by four inch spruce posts, placed at the corners and in the middle of each side. As the posts do not enter the ground, two men can easily lift the yard and carry it to fresh ground. Five strips are used on each side, with three inch spaces between the strips. On one side of the yard, two of the strips reach only half way, leaving an opening from the yard to the tokens, and even in these prosaic and mat-

Gloves and their Origin.

History tells us that gloves have been in use since the time of Pliny the younger, then, as now, were made of variaud ous kinds of leather, wool stuffs, velvet and silk. They were originally intended for use rather than ornaments, being, worn to protect the hands when performing outdoor labor.
