They gather the earliest smowdrase.
And the first crimson bods of the rose.

They toss the hay in the meadow;
They gather the elder-bloom white;
They find where the dust; grapes purple It is oft-timted October light. They know where the appies hang ripest, And are sweeter than Italy's wines; They thow where the fruit hains the thickest on the long thorny blackberry vines.

They gather the long delicate sea-weeds,
And build tiny castles of sand:
They pick up the beautiful sea shells—
Fairy barks that have drifted to land:
They wave from the tall, rocking tree-so
Where the oriole's hammook nest swin,
And at night-time are folded in slumber
By a song that a fond mother sing.

LUCK AND MORE LUCK.

[Boston Pilot.] In old times there lived where Bally towtas Castle now stands a poor man named Towtas. It was in the time when manna fell to the earth with the dew of the evening, and Towtas lived by gathering the manna, and thus supported himself, for he was a poor man, and had nothing else.

One day a peddler came by that wav with a fair, young daughter. "Give us a night's lodging," said he to Towtas, "for we are weary." And Towtas

Next morning, when they were going away, his heart longed for the young girl, and he said to the peddler: "Give me your daughter for my wife." "How one, will you support her?" asked the peddler. "Better than you can," answered Towtas, "for she can never want."

Then he told him all about the manna; how he went out every morning when it was lying on the ground with the dew, and gathered it as his father and forefathers had done before him, and lived on it all their lives, so that he had never known want, nor any of his people. Then the girl showed she would like to stay with the old man, and the

"Give me a trifle for God's sake," cried a voice, and he saw a third poor man before him. "I have nothing left," said Towtas, "but a few pence; if I give and they won't have them, I shall have nothing for food, and about in the morning." must die of hunger. And when dinner-hour came the lord's daughter linked her arm with Towtas, and smiled on him. And he drank of the rich wine, and was mad with love; but at last the wine overcame him, and the servants had to carry him to his bed, and in going into the room he dropped the ring from his finger, but knew it not.

Now, in the morning the lord's daughter came by, and cast her eyes upon the door of his chamber, and there close by it was the ring she had seen him wear. "Ah," she said, "I'll tease him now about his ring." And she put it in her box and wished she were as rich as a king's daughter, that so the king's son might marry her; and, behold! the shut it; and she put it from her into another box, and that filled also; and then she was frightened at the ring, and put it at last in her pocket as the safest

And he inquired of all the servants, and then of the lord's daughter, and she laughed, by which he knew she had it; but no coaxing would get it from her, so when all was useless he went away, and set out again to reach his old home.

And he was very mournful, and threw himself down on the ferns near an old fort, waiting till night came on, for he feared to go home in the day-light lest the people should laugh at him for his folly. And about dusk three cats came out of the fort talking to each other.

But alas! the tempter came. In an evil hour John Cain allowed the polihim. They said he was the strongest man in the county; that he could scoop out of his boots any man set up in op-position; that his virtues were many and his faults 000000; that it was his duty to come out and take a nomination

The politicians covered John Cain with soft soap. They told him that the canvass shouldn't cost him a red, and that he could still retire at eight every evening and rest assured that his interests would be properly cared for. It was to be a still hunt in a very quiet election, and he would hardly know what was going on. John was an honest, unsuspecting idiot, and he swallowed their words as the confiding fish absorbs

John Cain was duly nominated and he band came out and serenaded him. With the band came out several hunlred electors, who filled the Cain mansion to overflowing, spit tobacco allover the house, atc and drank all they could find, broke down the gate and went off with three cheers for John Cain.

Before the canvass was ten days old, half a dozen men called on Cain and gently hinted to him that he must come down with the "sugar." He didn't even know what "sugar" was until they explained. They wanted money to raise a pole, to buy beer, to get slips printed, and to do fifty other things with, all for his particular benefit, and he had to hand out the money. In the course of another week they drew Cain out to make a speech at a ward meeting. He tried to claw off, but they taid him that the opposing candidate, would run him out of sight if he didn't come out, and he went out. When he got through speaking the crowd drank at his expense, and Mr. Cain was astonished at the way liquor went down, and more astonished at the American manufacturers are producing wonders in dress novelties.

Mr. Cain wanted to hold popular views, and he had to be on all sides at once.

On the day of election they dragged him from poll to poll, stopping at all much for him. Every woman laid here the saloons on the way: he had to make plaster where there was room, and the two hundred and fifty-six thousand promises, pull his wallet out until it was as flat as a wafer, drink lager with some and cold water with others, and when night came he went home and Nijni Novgorod, on the banks of the tried to hug the hired girl, called Mrs Volga, is almost without business this Cain his dear old rhinoceros, and lel Cain his dear old rhinoceros, and fell over the cradle, and went to sleep with his head under the stove.
