OLD-TIME BEMINISCENCES. ough Traveling in Virginia and Kentucky, in Early Times.

BY W. W.

On one occasion it was my fortune to take a horseback trip from Big Sandy to the Kanawha valley, across the country; and, as my time was rather limited, I was constrained to ride after dark in a region at that time altogether unsettled and wild; and, worst of all in my case for a night ride, one quite unfamiliar to me. On the night in question, I had gone on several miles after narrowly escaping rolling over the last calin seen in the after last succeeded in getting up the high noon, and as the thick darkness came bank. A Michigan Office over the People's Bank. Dik knews at the far distance, bearing a Death and Morrages, and alliest some bank, when, in the far distance, papers, promptly stranded to Collecting made a I heard something that sounded worse than the muttering thunder to me—that pest of those wild mountain regions at that period—the scream of a panther. It came occasionally in short, snappish quavers, making my horse restive and fairly tremble under me and yet, after hearing it once or twice I felt reassured when it seemed to grov fainter, as if dying away in the distance finally ending altogether. But it had had the effect of hurrying me forward at whatever risk of possibly breaking my neek, until at length I was satisfied that I had gotten into the bridle path again, as I came to an open piece of water, the crossing of a creek, apparently—the faint reflection of the sur annardespite the deep darkness, making it plainly perceptible.

Supposing, of course, that it must b s "ford," or regular crossing-place, I rode straight across, and found myself on the opposite side in a thicket of laured bushes—I could feel them—but my horse couldn't climb up the steep bank. Thoroughly perplexed, and get-ting nervous as the heavy thunderstorm was rapidly coming closer and I had no desire to be caught out there in the creek, or even on its banks, I got off my horse and down into the water, and undertook carefully to feel for after entering the creek, they turned on leaving it. Unable to satisfy myself, I next tried in the deep dark ness, to ride down the bed of the creek; but fifty yards or so of experiment, as I floundered in and out of holes and over sunken logs, satisfied me that it wouldn't do; so, returning to the ford once more fortunately a sharp flash of lightning showed me horse tracks, and a sort of path leading down the bank of the creek on the same side I had approached it; and finally a sharp gallop of twenty minutes, as the light ming was more frequent, enabled me to reach a clearing and a cabin, and to get my horse and myself under shelter just as the storm came down with the utmost fury, making me thankful enough that it had not caught me out in the dark woods. That joint was one of many such expériences, where I had, in the blind forest paths, to trust the instincts o my horse for holding the right direction to places of shelter, althoughas if proved—he was not capable of leading off after getting clear of the woods and into the bed of the creek. I had dropped in upon a settler named Bill Short, who, late as it was, did not intend to let me go supperless to bed. With a house full of children, although two truckle-beds played a large part in disposing of the smaller fry, and the loft sufficed for the boys, there being but two beds in the room below. It, after all, shows how very fittle could accommodate, and satisfy too, the early settlers, for a merrier crowd I have seldom fallen among in any circle cr condition in life. The next morning, when I came to leave, I couldn't induce my kind-heart-ed and pleasant host to take anything; but it was some satisfaction finally, to remunerate him with a good supply of powder, which I caused to be conveyed to him: for that article seemed to be all that he craved or needed to make him reasonably happy, spart from his innated and complete freedom from

On my return by another road, however, on reaching the banks of Big Sandy, and proposing to ford it, I was diverted to a ford several miles from where I struck the bank of the river; but my trials on this journey appeared uncommonly numerous, for, on calling at a cabin in the vicinity of the place where I was expecting to cross the stream, a little boy was sent with me to point out the crossing. I didn't much like the looks of the alleged "ford" (if it was one), but, riding into the river promptly. I soon found my steed swimming instead of wading the stream. However, considering myself fairly in for it, I pushed boldly for the other side, but, to my disgust, on reaching it I found I had to encounter a ledge of rocks under water, and not far beneath the surface; but, after two or three efforts, my horse reared out on the bank.

> the English fox-hunter in the wilds of Kentucky. My adventures on my way down the river some six weeks afterward were not much of an improvement on those I have already given. Having business down the Ohio river, I concluded to take my way down Sandy to its mouth in a small cance or "dug out," in company with a remarkably tall fellow, some six feet four inches high, and, with a small box containing his "plunder," we started. The river was quite low, and by this time the nights had become frosty, and, while my companion was too big and clumsy to stand up and "pole" the cance I could do it when tired of paddling the craft. Inst about sunset, while I was thus occupied and while looking for some ettler's cabin on the bank of the river where we could spend the night, the canoe struck a sand-bar with shock as to throw me out into the river. The water was not very deep, but it certainly was very cold, and, wet almost to my shoulders, and the weather frosty as I have already said, it became pretty imperative to stop somewhere soon. And here was the first occasion where I had reason to complain of both Virginia and Kentucky "hospitality," for the river was the boundary along there between the two States. Calling first on the Kentucky side, after a shivering walk up to a double log cabin, I found some sort of a grand frolic on hand perhaps a wedding—and no chance to entertain strangers. Getting into the cance again, I resumed the paddle, and my teeth fairly chattered as the night ecame colder; suffice it that I tried three calins in going several miles down the river in the cold and darkness having had a long tramp up and across the river bottom in one instance to where I had seen a light. Various excuses were profferred until at last having, in the dark, come to a part of the river studded with great rocks and where the water ran more swiftly, I de-termined to borrow a light, and, building a boufire, spend the night in camping out as we best could. Fortunately we, about that time, heard the barking ci dogs, and, following the sound, we tched up at an old settler's hre and the other accommodations so much needed. For some time afterward, however, Virginia and Kentucky hospitality," I must confess, seemed the very good manners that it is too of the frequency of such occurrences But perhaps a settler whom I once enconntered, and at whose cabin I lodged upon the healwaters of the Kentucky river, could beat even my friend Bill Short, in his placid contentment with short commons and other disabilities, always more or less inci dental to an endeavor to make one of the army of occupants or skirmishers on the outposts of civilization. As was so often the case, we had been driven into harbor with him by stress of weather, and the slim chance there was to reaching any more eligible place; and after lodging myself and companion in a bed that had about two inches of straw on the boards, and that stood at right angles to and almost touched that of himself and wife, all he could furnish us besides was some frost-bitten sweet potatoes and a tin cup of water. It didn't appear to discompose the good-couple at all. He said he "had intended to take some corn to the mill and get it ground; and he had intended to go and shoot a deer, but he had put it off." My friend thought that his cabin was something like what is said of the bottomless pit -if not "paved with good intentions," it was-for any traveler driven to it-"tophet" all the same. However, I consoled both him and myself finally with the suggestion that if the mountaineer could stand such the whole time, surely we should put up with it once without grumbling.

A Man Stops Repudiation.

Years ago, Illinois was poor, and burdened with a debt of $7,000,000. A large part of the Indebtedness had been created in order to carry out a system of internal improvements. / The people finding it difficult to pay their taxes, talked loudly of repudiation. A convention met at Springfield, the capital of the State, to voice the popular feeling. The repudiating ordinance was prepared. It would have been adopted out for the interference of one man. Resolved, That illinois will be honest, almough she never pays a cent. ever pays a cent.

The resolution took like wildfire. It touched the honest sentiment of every member of the convention. It was adopted with the wildest enthusiasm. It dealt a death-blow to the repudiation sentiment throughout the State. The canal bonds immediately advanced in value, and in a short time

The Burlington (Vt.) Free Press contains a distressing account of a little girl's wanderings and death in the forests about Ripton. Two little girls, the daughters of Mr. J. E. Goodyess, were sent on an errand to a neighbor's house half a mile away. Returning, one of them went by the road, and the other took a foot-path through the woods. Julia, who had gone by the road, re-turned home safely, but the other, Bertha, who was only 9 years old, did not appear, and her mother, becoming enxious, started at once in search of her daughter. Soon finding that the little girl had wandered from the path, she gave an clarm, and a small body of men that constantly received accessions formed a skirmish line and the forest was thoroughly searched for about a mile and a half with no success, ex-cept the finding of the girl's tracks at two widely separated points. All the logging-roads with which the forest abounded were closely examined, when darkness put an end to the searching for a few hours. Reinforcements having arrived, a force of over a hundred men followed the roads by lantern-light for an honr or two, when, that failing, a halt was ordered until daybreak, when some 150 men pushed on, determined to find the little one. They found tracks following the North branch of Middlebury river, which flows through some steep hills in a rough, rocky chasm that would appal any but the strongest nerve from undertaking its descent. For some mile and a half further the girl was tracked, in which distance she d the branch twice, and, having reached the junction of the stream with familiar to me. The First Baby in California. It was on the Fourth of July, and Downleville celebrated. The stars and stripes floated from a peeled and loft; pine, and the chorus of the anvil had re echoed through the hills. The house was crowded with the miners: poet. reader and orator had performed their parts, and the recently organized brass much on the angles. Soap and the fin band was giving in boisterous resonance, ger-brush are all that is necessary to some national anthem, when, suddenly, there burst out the feeble wail of an infant; first low, then swelling out in all the defiant strength of his baby lungs. The band put forth its loudest strains; the baby, incited to renewed exertion, redoubled its vigor.

It was nip and tuck between the band and the baby. The young mother did her best to divert the child and hush him, when from the audience there up-rose a brawny miner, and, shaking first at the musicians he cried: Hush that blamed band, and give the baby a chance!" The band stopped its playing, and never did stalwart men en to sweeter music than those exiles from home and women, as they drank in the tones of the wailing child. There were tears in many an eye.
