The Return of the Crineline.

Fashion has once more brought back the crinoline. It tries to slip in quietly and gracefully; but it is the same old muisance in a form now reduced as I modified, but soon to regain its former gigantic proportions. When intervi-wed upon the subject, the manufacturers almit that the crinoline is again in dimand, but they plead that it is used only as a substitute for the bustle. Yes; it is now larger than the bustle, and supports the entire back of the skirts; but t is never carried around to the front "What, never?" Well, they confess that in the styles for the coming season the supporters are orinolined all the way around; but then these styles are not yet generally adopted. Of course not; but they will be when the season

Everybody made fun of the crinoline.

It was as fruitful a subject for caricature with pen and pencil as astheticism is now. The wits and the humorists fairly laughed it out of fashion. In fact, a lady with an immense crinoline was a very comical object. When she got into a carriage or an omnibus, when she sat down on a sofa or a theater seat, when she ascended a stairs or a stoop, the orinoline bulged and swayed and made revolutions at which the vulgar laughed and the judicious grieved. For inconvenience to others, and for the disfigur erinoline has never been rivaled. Yet it was always a favorite with the ladies who wore it, and they will secretly welcome its return to fashion. The reasons for this favoritism' are three-fold: In the first place the crinoline supports the robes of the ladies and off that weight from the waist of which all women complain. Secondly, it makes the dress stand out, and gives a much better opportunity to display rich costumes. Thirdly—but this is in confidence- many ladies are not so sure of the classic beauty of their forms that they are enamored of the limp fashion which now disguises nothing. Ladies certainly do not like to be laughed at; but, although the abandoned crinoline in deference to the popular satires upon it, they will agree that there never was more universally becoming. The gen-tlemen do not coincide with them; but when was a man's opinion about a woman's attire of the slightest value or outside of Worth's establishment? had petter vatch him. Don't let him The effect of fashion upon business is shown by the fact that enough crinoline can not now be obtained to supply the renewed demand. A few years ago millions of dollars were invested in its manufacture : thousands of hands were employed; inventors puzzled their brains for improvements in the hoops or the skirts. The fashion changed, and all this industry cassed as if by magic, and hoopskirts, banished from public society, served as chicken coops in the country. Now, when the fashion has revived, the manufactories will have to be built up again. But, as Colonel Sellers observes, ill the old patents, all the old jokes, all the old cuts, and all the old caricatures upon crinoline will be again available, and every belle will be hooped up like a barrel or a fancy stock. - New York
