Feeding Eskimo Dogs.

The duty of feeding the dogs is often intrusted to the boys, and it is no easy work. The most common food for the dogs is walrus-skin, about an inch to an inch and a half thick, cut in strips each about as wide as it is thick, and from a foot to eighteen inches long. The dog swallows one of these strips as he would a snake: and it is so tough that when he has swallowed about twelve pieces, it is no great wonder that he does not want anything more for two days. Sometimes they cut the food up into little pieces inside the igloo, where the dogs can not trouble them, and then throw it out on the snow; but this is not altogether a good way; for then the little nogs get it all while the big dogs are fighting, for these big burly fellows are sure to have an unnecessary row over each feeding. If pieces too large to swallow at a gulp are thrown out, the large dogs get the food; and so, between the big dogs and the little dogs, the Eskimo boys have a hard time making an equal distribution among the animals.

One winter night, I remember, while on our sledge-journey, returning to North Hudson's Bay, Teoloosh was feeding his dogs, with no one to help him. He was on his knees near the num. He was on his knees near the tyloo door, and throwing the bits to the various dogs; the heads of which were crowded in the entrance. One big dog, after it had received its share, having after it had received its share, having driven all the other dogs away, seemed determined not to leave. Tooloosh grew angry, seized his stick and rushed out after it to settle matters. But he came rushing back even laster than he went out, seized his gun hurriedly, and as hastily was gone again. Before we could surmise what it meant, a shot was heard, and in a few seconds more. Toolooah came crawling in, dragging a big wolf after him, its white fangs showing in its black mouth in a way that made us shudder. This was the big dog Toolooah had been feeding, but it did not understand the customs of the Eskimo dogs well enough to know that it must stop eating when only half satisfied: and this ignorance cost it its life.

The Curiosities of Burning.

There are many curiosities of burn ing of extraordinary rapidity of com-bustion, which would be worth detail-ing if we had the space. Bad building is the cause of most, for bad building means rapid destruction by fire. The party wall in the majority of old houses built in a row, and in many new, does not reach to the roof, as it should, and the space between creates a channel—almost a blowpipe—for the spread of the fire to the next, which is very difficult to deal with. It is a danger provided expensely the logical time. vided against by legislation, (for it is known that a 9-inch brick wall will re-sist fire as long as it stands.) but often of the Titisville World, making quite a reputation as a humorist. He has been on the Enquirce for several years.

The population of the United States is creating wealth at this date faster than any other people in the world. Her securities sell for a higher price in the great markets than those of any other country. If a large navy or a large army were wanted it could be considered. dangerous with which the brigade have to cope. The glass soon cracks and falls out, the air rushes in, and the whole soon becomes one vast blast furmace. Perhaps the most dangerous of all are those lofty establishments of flats which very properly go by the name of the builders or proprietor's their great height there are neither ladders long enough nor water-jets powerful enough to reach the top stories.—The Combil Magazine. A Statesman's Grief.

I reached here in time to receive the conscious and precious blessing of my mother on her dying bed. "God unmother on her dying bed. "God unloosed her weary star" so peacefully that it seemed like the unrippled calm of a lake reflecting a serene and cloudless heaven. I could not have gone on my mission abroad with such a dear one in life at home. In one sense I may now go without "dragging each remove a lengthening chain of tilial fear." This loss of my mother is the greatest affliction I ever knew. My mother was more to me that words. mother was more to me that words can tell. She is one of the bonds which binds me to Maryland. Thus: My grandfather, my mother's father, was Judge Samuel Sullivan. He came to Ohio in 1804, from New Castle, Del. His grandfather came over with Lord Baitimore. I have heard my grand-father say that he remembered his grandmother counting her beads. These Quaker-Methodists of Northern Dela-ware and early Ohio, when they immi-grated to Ohio, were three generations grated to Ohio, when they immingrated to Ohio, were three generations before devout Catholics. But the change of faith never swerved the ancestral integrity. My mother's father, Judge Sullivan—whose name I bear was selected as the trustworthy Sena-tor for the office of State Treasurer in 1818, when the treasury had been despoiled, and on his bond was every member of the Legislature. This is one of the incidents I love to recall; and as I lay my blessed mother, away to-day I feel an honest pride in her honest ancestry which compensates for many poignancies. - Sunsat Cox to a Friend in Baltimore.
