Saturday last was a fearful hot day and thermometers are said to have registered as high as 92° in the shade. A thunder storm, accompanied by a slight shower of rain cooled the atmosphere in the atternoon, but Sunday and Monday were also very hot days.

On Saturday last ye editor, accompanied by his two children, visited Ella Main's, near Wampler's Lake, and went fishing. Two four pound pickerel and two or three back bass-were captured, and there's no telling how many blue gills we might have caught had not the rain interfered and driven us ashore. ABOUT THE "EVIL EYE."

An Important Class of Legends and Superstitions-A Strange Tale. The direct oriental origin of the Irish imple has been contended for by many writers on the subject, and one of the principal arguments in favor of their resulting actions in the subject.

principal arguments in favor of their position is found in the similarity of the legendary lone of Treland to that of Arabia. Persia and India. Among the peoples haing in these countries a very important class of legends and superstitions relate to the "evil eye," and in Ireland, also hundreds of tales are told of the mal also. Illustress of tales are touch in the might influence exerted by certain people supposed to have the power of doing mischief by a glance. Every one knows how great is the influence of a pseculiar kind of eye sometimes seen, and how depressing the control of the property of the pro and sometimes overawing it is, and in this and sometimes overawing it is, and it this fact is perhaps found the origin of the tales concerning the evil eye.

According to the Irish stories, the evil eye is generally suaken, small and half concated by a shagey, overhanding eye brow. Its glance is able to cause sickness of almost any kind, to inflict sudden and otherwise uneconstable pains in various otherwise unaccountable pains in various parts of the body; to blight a crop; to render a household utensil worthless for the purpose for which it was designed; to make a horse fall lame or a cow go off her make a noise rai raine of a Congo of the milk. When infants are booked at or spoken of a blessing is always pronounced. spoken of a messing saway production therefore, by persons who have no intention of doing them harm. A notable instance of the contrary is cited by Ludy Wilde of an infant in Galway. It was so beautiful that every one who saw it at once cried out "God bless it." in order that it with the greatest from all harm. that it might be preserved from all harm that it might be preserved from all harm. One day a strange woman, never before seen in the neighborhood, came to the door and, stepping for an instant, saw the child and walked in without invitation, seated herself and asked for a drink of water. It was given her, but all the time she kept her eyes fixed on the child without speaking of it or saying "God bless it." She went away, and that night the baby fell ill and cried all night. The next day the child was worse and the fairy doctor was sent for, who immediately saw what was child was worse and the fairy doctor was sent for, who immediately saw what was the matter with the baby, and told the mother that this was not her child, but a fairy changeling: that her own baby had been with the fairies ever since the visit of the strange woman. In order to re-cover the child the mother must find the stranger, cut off a bit of her gown and burn it, when the fairies would be compelled to restere her own. "A few days after the stranger was seen again passing the door; the mother ran out and pressed her to enter; she did so, and while sh her to enter, she and so, and, where sawas drinking a noggin of milk the mother secretly clipped a bit off the strange woman's gown and afterward burned it, sholding the child in the smoke till it succeed three times, when she knew her

Where Lightning Strikes. From statistics collected in parts of the German empire, G. Hellman finds that the danger from Lehtning, though generally increasing, is diminishing in certain districts, the risks becoming less the more closely houses are clustered. The character of the soil has great influence. Letting one represent the danger from lightning on calcareous ground, two will give it upon mark, nine upon sandy, and twenty-two upon cayey soil. It is a curious fact, not yet explained, that oaks are struck much more frequently than other trees; so that if the danger for beeches be one. that for pairs is fifteen, and for oaks, fifty from Arkansaw Traveler.

Must the Mustache Go?

I have noticed the expression of mustacheless men by the hundred, without finding one—from P. T. Barnum to Adonia Dixey—who. I thought, would look the better for having his upper lip covered with hair. I think that almost every intelligent person who will note the appear once of many mustacheless men can hardly telligent person who will note the appearance of many mustacheless men can hardly fail to agree with me in believing that no man without a mustache should grow one. It is not always easy to see that a man with a mustache would look the better were he to remove it, and should he do so he must undergo something of an ordeal of the best in the stronged to the color of his

he must undergo something of an ordeal before his his tanned to the color of his face and his acquaintances have become familiar with his channed appearance.

Nevertheless, the conclusion that the smistache ought to go seems inevitable if the proposition stated in the preceding sentence be admitted. It isn't English, you know, to wear a mustache. It isn't always nice, as, for example, when eating soup. Nor is it an essential mark of desirable distinction, since representative men without mustaches can be found in straide distinction, since representative men without mustaches can be found in all classes of society. And if, as I have embravored to show, any person can find by observation that men with shawen upper lip need no mustaches—in other words, that mustaches do not improve words, that inustacles do not improve men's appearance, why then should the mustache have any friends?

You never can read the expression of a man's face unless you can see his mouth. But beard upon other parts of his face than his upper this caldon acts as a mark than his upper lip seldom acts as a mask. than his upper up section acts as a haza-Lincoln perhaps improved his appearance by growing whiskers, but the familiar ex-pressions of his countenance were not lost. He would doubtless have put on a disguise by wearing a mustache. Paint a heavy mustache on the face of your Washington and you will destroy the intellectual expression of his countenance just as surely as by growing a similar appendage on your own upper lip you will make yourself appear otherwise than you are.—Cor. Attraction of a Mexican Town.

About night the church towers of Jalapa could be seen in the distance, and shortly after the train entered the town. The Mexicans have not exaggerated the beauties of the place. Standing on the sloping side of a hill, it is sheltered from all cold winds. The streets are wide, but so steep that carriages cannot be used, hence every one has to walk. Streams of water run through all the gutters, carrying foff whatever refuse is thrown out. water run through alt the gutters, carrying 'off whatever refuse is thrown out from the houses. In an American city a single apple or pear-tree is guarded by an eight foot Tence, on the top of which sharp pointed nails form a prominent feature. Even then the chances are that the fruit will be stolen in less than two weeks after the blossoms disappear, and the lowner of the place is in constant danger of being killed by the llying sticks and clubs. Not only are fruit trees left inguarded, but the doors of the houses are seldom looked, and burgof the houses are seidom locked, and ourselaries are unknown.
