THE CAPTAIN'S GRIP.

N old California triend-John Wilson, let us call himfor conveniencehad been strolling about New York. refreshing his ly "taking in" the sights. In piloting him round the city I naturally Stumbled upon the Eden Musee, and took him to see the grisly groups and tableaux in the crypt. He was very much interested in them and repeatedly expressed surprise and admiration at the artistic and realistic effects of the grouping and at titudes. Having worn the blue during the civil war he was especially attracted by the representation of uster's last fight; but I observed that he could hardly take his eyes off a group of figures in oriental cos. tumes, and that for some minutes after examining that group he continued grave and absent minded. Presently, at luncheon, I asked Jack what particular memory that oriental tableau had stimulated. I put the question advisedly, because I knew that my friend had seen men and cities and experienced many and strange adventures, and all his stories were good, while most of them were apt to be new. So I deliberately angled for a yarn, feeling that it would farmonise better with a cigar than a fresh decent into the streets. Jack, on being questioned, fell once more into his abstracted mood, and, after a minute of silence, said slowly:

I was thinking of a group I once saw, not composed of waz figures, yet as rigid and motionless, in which an Oriental bore a conspicuous part." After this beginning, of course, I did not let Jack go until he had told his story, and what he said is now reproduced here:

After the close of the war I found it impossible to settle down again to humdrum work, but I soon found that if I was in search of adventure it would be necessary to try some other untry than my own. The United States was at that time bound to make up for lost time. All the busness men and money making tendencies of the nation seemed stimulated to the uttermost. Speculation was booming; the war spirit had put unheard of audacity into all kinds of commercial enterprises, and, generally, the hour of the capable had come. I did not happen to be one of these. I had a little money, enough to live upon comfortably, and I felt no inlination to go a grubbing for more. Action, excitement, picturesqueness, the unexpected were what I desired and I began looking over the world or some situation containing a

"At last I got tired of waiting and tried to compromise with myself by a course of drifting. I drifted to the Pacific coast; then to the Sandwich Islands; from there to Japan, and after a stay of several months in one of the most interesting countries as among the most delightful people I know I found my way to Canton. This was some time after Horatio E. Lay's flasco. You remember about No? Well, this Lay was a blue blooded English diplomatic fellow, who thought he could do a stroke of business for himself by undertaking to organize a fleet for the Chinese government wherewith to put down piracy, at that time very put down pracy, at that time very troublesome, especially in and about Kwangtung. Lay obtained some sort of authority, went to England, bought or built a lot of gunboats, fitted them out for service and engaged Capt. Sherard Osborne, a gallant naval officer, to command the squadron. "But this was not what the Chinese wanted. Their idea was to man the vessels with their own people, and give them native officers, too. course, this would have resulted in one of two ways; either the pirates would have captured the gunboats promptly, or the commanders of the gunboats would have gone into partnership with the pirates. That, however, was nobody's business but that of the government, whose subjects were cutting one another's throats Lay was repudiated; the contracts made by him were rejected, and finally. Sir F. Bruce solved the difficulty that the government would buy her if she proved up to her guarantees.

"Now, to test such a boat, it was intricate waters thoroughly."

portunity, and hastened to offer my services. You know I was in the navy before the war, and I had passfelt myself competent to manage this gunboat, which was only a small craft, calculated for shallow waters, and carrying a crew of one hundred men. Well, I had friends, and got the command; and after the usual trouble in scraping a ship's company together, and then drilling them into something like working order, I was ready for sea.

"The Chinese authorities had considered that it would be as well to the make the trial trip pay expenses, if possible, by extending the test so as to ascertain what the gunboat was good for in action. At that time the mouth of Pearl river was intested by piratical junks, which found shelter and easy means of escupe in the nu-merous small islands and estuaries inmemory, visiting to which the delta of that stream is new points of in- divided. The pirates usually confined terest and general- their attention to the craft of their own countrymen, but occasionally, when the grist was very short or the opportunity very tempting, they would attack some small foreign mer-chantman; and, in these cases, they made it a rule to kill every soul on board, as the simplest way of preventing those awkward fereign pro-tests which were sure to stir the mandarins up to a serious crusade

"You, of course, understand that piracy in China is not regarded as a heinous crime. The Mongolian view of the business is pretty much that which all the western nations held in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth centuries; only there is less romance and more practicability about the pigtails Very respectable Chinese business men interest themselves in piracy along the Kwangtung coast, just as staid old English merchants used to interest themselves in smug-gling a hundred years ago, and nobody thinks the worse of a man for having been a pirate, provided he has been lucky at it. As to the taking of life, there is so much superflu-ous humanity in China, and life there is so little worth living for the majority, that public opinion is quite indifferent on the subject.

"While I had been drumming up my crewin Canton I had fallen in with an American skipper who had sized some time been sailing a good sized coaster for a wealthy Chinese house. He had his wife with him, and they were both very pleasant people. He was a Cape Cod man, not pretty to fancy must have come from the south. At all events she had a southern complexion—a clear pallor—with black eyes and hair and a southern supple ness and grace of bearing. She was not exactly a pretty woman, but decidedly pleasing, and her composure and quiet, gentle manners won upon you steadily. Both of them spoke Chinese fluently, and they gave a favorable account of the people "They had a special pet in a Chinese steward named Tin-Ling, a burly, round faced fellow, who would have passed muster anywhere for an hon-est man but for his eyes. They struck me as treacherous from the first. He never looked anybody squarely in the face, or encountered a steady glance without squirming. I conglance without squirming. I concluded, however, that his employers understood him, and, anyhow, it has no affair of mine. My acquaint ance with the Winsar's lasted until an anomal has been wounded. But, if alive, where was he? Silence reigned throughout the vessel. I went down the companion was no sign of life there. I of course was no sign of life there. I of course was no sign of life there. She would be away some three months, and would visit a number of little ports. I expected to get away about forty eight hours after her, and the evening before she left I took supper aboard her with the skipper and we drank a farewell As I was going away I hap pened to see Tin Ling leaning over the side talking to some rough looking men in a sampan alongside, and in a half joking way I said:

"We reached the mouth of the river, with Chinese officers; and even a anchored for the night, and next Chinese crew could hardly do her morning at daybreak hove up and justice in the engine room and stoke hole. So it was determined to make a trial trip with a scratch crew of white men; and when I heard they were looking about for somebody to command her I jumped at the opjustice in the engine room and stoke began to thread the creeks and estubeing doubtful of the neighborhood, I kepta boat's crew rowing guard all night, for it was so dark in there that ed a good examination in steam, so the pirates might have surrounded us without being seen, provided they were quite enough. However, we were not disturbed, and the second day opened without much prospect of excitement. Probably the pirates had got wind of our expedition and had made themselves scarce. In any asse there was nothing to do but to go on, and on we went. The scenery was interesting enough if I had cared for that, but I was fidgeting to try guns on a mob of pirate junks, and the idea of being fooled was not

I waited for the smoke to rise, and thus ascertained the scene of the difficulty, whatever t was. The white smoke showed above the trees about four miles off in a straight line as nearly as I could judge, but how far that meant by water it was quite impossible to tell. My delta pilot, who had pricked up his ears like an old character on the bar sike an old character of the bar sike and the zer on hearing the firing, told me he knew where the fighting was going on and could take me to it, would require a full hour to get there. There was no help for it, of course. We could not straighten or shorten the winding channel, nor could we lap on full speed. The firing meantime continued in a queer spasmodi-way, and at intervals the rattle of the matchlocks was punctuated by the matchlocks was punctuated by a much clearer, sharper sound, which I selt sure was that of arifle or a revolver. This made the case more serious, for it looked as though the pairates were attacking a foreign that is, European) vessel.

"It was tiresome work crawling through these passages, and I was afraid we should be too late for help n the rescue after all. But at last we rounded a bluff point and came suddenly into a sort of lagoon, three suddenly into a sort or lagoon, three-times as wide as the average pass-ages, and then we saw what all the fuss meant. There lay my friend Winsar's bark the So-Kiang, fairly surrounded, at a distance of a hunlred yards, by vicious looking junks, which were peppering her at leisure, was a Cape Cod man, not pretty to out not yet venturing to board her. Probably they had suffered from and the biggest hands and feet fever saw. His hands, especially, would have attracted attention anywhere, have attracted attention anywhere, not only for their size, but for the look of the latent muscular power in them. He was not one of those disagreeable big fisted men who thinks it a good joke to crush your fingers in slaking hands with you, but when he did shake hands with a restrained, friendly grip you felt the possibilities the gunboat for a few moments, and of his squeeze plainly enough. "I suppose I ought to have armed ny boats and chased the rufflans, but was feeling uneasy about Winsar, whose rifle I had not heard for severil minutes, and I remembered, too. with fresh misgiving, the sinister cooks of the pet steward, Tin-Ling. So after driving half a dozerfunks ashore I drew alongside of the Sociator, piped away the cutter and went abourd her. The first thing I cotted was that the deek was desert. loticed was that the deck was desertd. The next sign I looked for was narks of blood, but there were none. But, if alive, where ng out of the glare of the sun my yes could not instantly adjust themelves to the semi-darkness of the abin. but by the time I reached the loor I could see well enough, and the scene that met me on the threshold prought me to a dead halt. This is the tableau I there saw: In the standing bed place lay the body of Mrs. Winsar, the face white, still, fixed, with horror in the wide open eyes. A thin stream of blood and trickled down her breast. Over half joking way I said:

"Winsar, don't you think you trust that fellow too much? If I were in your place, with nobody about me hut Chinese, I should keep about me hut Chinese, I should keep the point of the blade suspended not two inches above Mrs. Winsar's eyes as shifty as his.

"The captain laughed carelessly, and merely said something about Tip-Ling being all right, and so we parted.

"To have about mrs. winsar's heart. Holding the assassin in an eloping his throat, the other clasped about the wrist of his knife arm, stood Capt. Winsar. His form was frawn to its full height; his eyes litrally blazed from a face white as the machinery working smoothly and leath, and he stood as if turned to and said wearily: 'Take this devil, Ar. Wilson, he has killed my wife.' With that he released his hold on Tin-Ling's throat. I looked at the hinaman, whose head tell limply on his shoulder, and saw at once that he was dead. His neck was broken, and in all probability, in the very moment Winsar set his grip upon it. How long the captain had stood there, holding the corpse, we never knew, but it was at least ten minutes.

As we raised our eyes from the black-ened features of the traitor a faint sigh caught my ear, and, turning to the bed, I saw that Mrs. Winsar's eyelids were quivering. 'Captain!' I cried excitedly, 'I don't think your wife is dead, after all! "And, to cut a long story short, she was not dead; she was not even dangerously hurt. She had caught Tin-Ling rushing in upon her with his knife, perhaps bent only upon plunder at the moment; but she shricked, and the steward sprang upon her. Her husband had heard her scream, and rushed below at the very instant Tin-Ling's knife was descend ing. Its point had cut just deep peculiar ripping creacking sound broke the silence. #### Why Dinner Was Very Late.

Here is one on Thad Spindle which, hough it happened some time ago, has not been told: Thad went home one evening not long ago and found that dinner was not ready. The groceryman had not sent his basket of marketing which he had ordered on his way down town that morning. The cook had expected it every minute, and this caused the delay In no happy frame of mind he went to the grocery some blocks away and wanted to know why his market hasket had not been sent out home. Regrets and apologies were ample.

It would go at once.

Now Thad dosen't mind carrying a market basket when he is in good humor, but he left still in high dudgeon and scorned to touchit, leaving it for them to send. If there is one thing that he likes better than way home he stopped to talk gun to his friend the doctor. He did not hurry, as he knew the dinner had to be cooked before it could be served. Finally he noticed that there was an exceedingly diminutive darky with an exceedingly large market basket sitting on the curbatone just out of carshot from him and the doctor. The darky looked very like one he had seen in the grocery, and the market basket looked very like his "What are you doing there?" gem-man, and I'se follah'n yo', sah." -Louisville Times.

In a conversation with Judge Joeph Cox, who is a very pleasant talker and full of anecdotes and information, he said: "I was talking to General W. T. Sherman, several years ago, about riding horses and mules, and he said; 'Cox, a mule is the easiest animal to ride in the world. I always preferred to ride one during the war. #### UNFORTUNATE OPERA SINCERS. Sad Fate of Brignoli, Susini and Othe Once Popular Favorites.

"I think," says an old habitue of the theatre in New York, "that nine out of ten great musical artists come to some unhappy end. Take Brignoli, for instance. He simply rolled in money. For years there was a steady deluge of gold on him. He practically had the earth. He might have been living now, a millionaire many times over. His success, unlike that of many other favorites, was not short-lived. He sang longer in the United States than any tenor who has been here before or since. But he was like all the rest. "I think," says an old habitue of the The money which fell into his coffers fell into a sieve. He always lived at the Everett House when in New York. He had spent so much warfet. He had spent so much money there in He had spent so much money there in his prosperous days that the proprietor, when he died, left a verbal direction that Brignoli should always have a free home there as long as he lived. He died there absolutely penniless. He was buried by the contributions of his friends and admirers.

"Then there was poor Susini. What a sad fate he had! He came What a sad fate he had! He came here twenty-five years ago, from South America and appeared at the Academy. The public idolized him in torrents. The public idolized him in torrents. He was a wonderfully companionable man, and was loved personally as well as admired artistically. In spite of all the wealth that came to him he was always poor. His liberality knew no bounds. He was the prey of parasites and hangers on from the start. He married finally a Miss Hinckley, of Albany, and out of that marriage grew a tragedy. He loved his wife dearly, and when she died it broke him down. He entirely lost his voice. With his and when she died it broke him down. He entirely lost his voice. With his only child, a daughter, he went to live in London, but returned to New York where his daughter, who had then grown up, married a well-known young dentist. She died, and it drove her husband, crazy. He hunted all over the city with a pistol for the doctor who attended his wife, with the firm intention of killing him. Not finding him, he blew his own brains out. Soon after this Susini, a childless widower, without a penny in the world,

The Race With the Press. Dr. Wendell Holmes, says: It is

ust as well to recognize the fact that just as well to recognize the fact that if one should read day and night, contining himself to his own language, he could not pretend to keep up with the press. He might as well try to race with a locomotive. The first discipline, therefore, is that of despair. If you could stick to your reading day and of murder.

A case in point is reported from In idiot you would be been before the century was over! Well, then, there is no need of gorging one's self with knowledge, and no need of self-reproach because one is content to remain more or less ignorant of many things which interest his fellow creatures. We get a good deal of knowledge through the atmosphere; we learn a great deal by accidental here-say, provided we have the mordant in the wise remark, the significant fact, the instructive incident, take hold upon it. After the stage of despair comes the period of consolation. We soon find that we are not so much worse off than most of our neighbors as we posed. The fractional value of the wisest shows a small numerator divided by an infinite denominator of knowledge.

Babies' Need of Sleep,

A young baby should spend most of its time in sleep. Never allow it to be wakened for any purpose whatever. A child's nerves receive a shock every time it is roused from sleep, which is most injurious to it. Admiring friends should be made to wait until it is awake, to kiss it and play with it. After it is nursed at night put it back in its crib, and if it is comfortable it will soon fall asleep. It should never sleep in the bed with an older person. the crib with its head to the Place the crib with its head to the light so as to protect the eyes from the glare. PLACE—The temple courts at Jerusalem.
RULERS.—Same as before.
CONNECTING LINKS.—In the last quarter we left our study at the life of Jesus with the multitude bringing him in triumphal procession into Jerusalem. On the night after that triumphal entry Jesus went back to Bethany. In the morning he returned to Jerusalem and taught there for a day or two. Finally, leaving the temple for the last time, he went away to return no more until the afternoon of the passover. It was probably on Tuesday of passion week, the closing day of Christ's ministry, that this parable was told. We are to picture two distinct classes of fundily attentive listeners in the great crowd that pressed about Jesus—those who had followed him from Galliee with enthusisam and his priestly Galilee with enthusiasm and his priestly and Pharisaic foes. In my search after the origin of the phrase I came upon the record of a certain John Dennis, an English critic and poet in a small way, who lived in the eighteenth century. In his capacity of critic he wrote a savage review of Pope's "Essay on Man," and the revengeful poet replied by immortalizing Mr. Dennis in "The Dunciad," after this fashion:

Should Dennis publish you had stabb'd your brother.
Say what revenge on Dennis can be had?
Too dull for laughter, for reply too mad; On one so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me so poor you cannot take the law; One me poor you c
