FORESTER PREDICTS WILDLIFE FAMINE

Michigan can expect a gradual and continual decrease in most types of wildlife, according to Paul A. Herbert, head of the forestry department at MSC.

Forty years ago foresters were predicting a timber famine, Herbert points out. The years have proved those predictions correct. Today we can predict a wildlife famine with equal confidence, he believes.

Most of the larger forms of wildlife of major interest to the tourist and hunter require cover and food of a kind that is rapidly disappearing in Michigan. Without such protective cover and food it is inevitable that a large part of the wildlife will starve or be destroyed.

According to Herbert, a wildlife famine cannot be so easily avoided but it could be made much less severe if all persons connected with wildlife came to a realistic grip with the problem. Herbert believes this a matter of time. "My prediction of a wildlife famine within 40 years stands."

Michigan can expect a gradual and continual decrease in most types of wildlife, according to Paul A. Herbert, head of the forestry department at MSC.

Forty years ago foresters were predicting a timber famine, Herbert points out. The years have proved those predictions correct. Today we can predict a wildlife famine with equal confidence, he believes.

Most of the larger forms of wildlife of major interest to the tourist and hunter require cover and food of a kind that is rapidly disappearing in Michigan. Without such protective cover and food it is inevitable that a large part of the wildlife will starve or be destroyed.

According to Herbert, a wildlife famine cannot be so easily avoided but it could be made much less severe if all persons connected with wildlife came to a realistic grip with the problem. Herbert believes this a matter of time. "My prediction of a wildlife famine within 40 years stands."
