SUCCESS AD

The problem of what forage The problem of what forage crop to plant—red clover or alfalfa—is confronting many larmers. They must make their plans for spring seeding, says C. M. Harrison of the Michigan State College farming department. use BOTH halves of this HARVESTING PACKAGE seed is abundant in supply and relatively low in price. However, adapted alfalfa seed for northern growers is in shorter supply and relatively expensive. Harrison points out that alfalfa is still the most productive legume in terms of tonnage of high quality roughage for hay and pasture. A seeding, once established generally lasts from two to three years, allowing costs of seed and seeding to be spread over a longer period than is true for red clover.

Of red clover, he advises that it is a short rotation forage legume—its productive life of high quality forage is only one year, the year after seeding. It is far less productive as pasture during dry summer periods. ALL-CROP Harvester the during dry summer periods.

When choosing which they may plant, farmers should consider that where short rotations are the rule and where the largest bulk of forage is cut once for hay and then plowed under for succeeding crops, red clover has much in its favor.

On farms where livestock are the number one enterprise. Harrison believes that a productive field of alfalfa is much more important than red clover. He cautions farmers that the price alone should not be the determining factor in choosing. However, if no alfalfa seed grown in northern or central areas can be purchased, red clover should be a better choice than unadapted alfalfa. Such alfalfa tends to thin out badly if it does not completely winterwill the first winter after seeding.
