Lost: The Art of Good Handwriting

telephone company lost $50.000 "because girls couldn't write call tickets plainly enough for the company to charge them."

And things are no better on the home front, according to the Mandwriting Foundation. Good handwriting, foundation. Good handwriting, fonce-considered one of the social graces, is rapidly becoming a lost art. Many a domestic mishap can be traced to an illegibly written note of instructions—to milkman, teacher, or hubby on a shopping trip. On the business side of every woman's life, says the Foundation, whether she be housewife, student, or active business woman, good handwriting is essential to economy, efficiency, and to a well-run organized life. It must be revived from the days of the school desk and inkwell for today's homemaker:

1. Keep an orderly check book. A good homemaker should also be a good bookkeeper. As more and more families have joint checking accounts today, it's important that both husband and wife keep clear records. Legible check stubs eliminate errors at bank statement time.

2. Thenk you notes should still be penned personal bread and butter note, well written on attractive "informals."

3. Geed manners should be stimaled to home and the school. Written impressions count.

4. Sign all charge account example to pour child. A note from you to the teacher is sometimes the only link between home and the school. Written impressions count.

5. Be systematic in making up your bouseheld lists. A handy not in the supermarket with come home to find she's washed the "doors" instead of the "floors."
